

Bio-Growth Forte

General Information

Hair loss, also known as alopecia or baldness, refers to a loss of hair from the head or body. People have between 100,000 and 150,000 hairs on their head. Each hair grows at a rate of about one-half inch per month for two to six years, and then falls out. It's normal for people to lose 50 to 100 hairs each day as part of the normal telogen cycle. In order to maintain a normal volume, hair must be replaced at the same rate at which it is lost.

Signs of hair loss

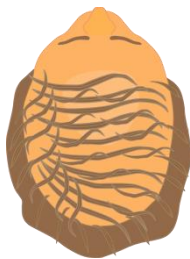

The first signs of hair thinning that people will often notice are more hairs than usual left in the hairbrush after brushing or in the basin after shampooing. You're balding, however, when more hair falls out than is replaced, the new hair is thinner than the hair that fell out, or the hair falls out in clumps.

Psychological Effect

Hair thinning and baldness cause psychological stress due to their effect on appearance. Although baldness is not as common in women as in men, the psychological effects of hair loss tend to be much greater.

Typical Female
Hair loss Pattern

Men typically present with progressive hair loss at the temples and vertex balding as early as the age of 36, whereas women typically present with diffuse hair loss over the top of their scalps, and can be as early as 40 years of age.

In both cases, hair production slows down with thinner and weaker hairs. Eventually, hair production in the follicles stops.
